13. Namos, British str., for Fonchow. HOW A GOOD SHIP WAS LOST. On the night of October 27th, 1842, the good ship Mary Compton of Bristol, England, was struggling with a fearful gale off the coast of North America. The wind blew fariously, but the weather was clear, and the Captain expected every moment to get sight of the light in the lighthouse on the Iron Rock Shoals. This lighthouse marked the entrance to the harbour. Once there, and they were safe. Sure of his position, he sailed on confidently. Five minutes later the ship struck with a fearful shock and went to pieces. Four men, including the Captain, were saved. On reaching the shore they found a strange thing had happened. An enemy of the lighthouse keeper had bound him hand and foot and extinguished the light. Souls, as well as ships, steer by the lights. Hope is the most important lighthouses in the world. What shall be said of the man who darkens it in the face of a storm-tossed spirit? "You are beyond human aid." These words were said by a physician to a woman who had come to consult him. Admitting that he thought so, had he the right to say so ?.. No: for he might be wrong-and in any case he had This woman had been ill for some time. In ORDINARY MEETING of SHARE. Now First Published.] CHAPTER IX. Learn to win a lady's faith Nouly, as the thing is high, Bravely, as for life and eath,

With a loyal gravity. No shadow from the past fell on Sir Reginale Denison as he moved amongst his guests. He bore himself with a well-bred case, his smiling face betraving no sign of the secrets buried in his breast.

"If he thought of Winifred at all it was without remores for the ruin that he had brought upon her young life. He bad come to regard his marriage as an unfortunate incident, from which he himself was the chief sufferer, and which if must be his business to forgot. If the image of his wife presented itself to his mind he paid the tribute of a sigh, but the sigh was given to what he had come to look upon as his own supremo folly in having forged himself a tie that he

Since he parted from Winifred at York, when they went their several ways after exchanging pledges not to molest each other if their paths in life happened hereafter to cross, there had been times when the matrimonial chain clanked loudly in bis ears. But nearly two years had rolled away since husband and wife parted by mutual consent, and Sir Reginald Denison had grown so accustomed to his liberty as to fall under the delusion that he was free, whenever it pleased him, to contract a new tie. He did not blind bimself to the fact that a bigamous marriage was a circumstance that the law would take a Miss Goffie, with a touch of contempt in her severe account of. But he relied on. Winifred's silence, satisfied that she would fulfil her part of

It did not secur to him that when Winifred declared herself so resolutely in favour of cutting her life adrift from his, she had failed to reckon with all the difficulties of the position, or that the thought of a second marriage being contracted by either of them had not entered into her contemplation. All he cared to know was that she had manifested an invincible repugnance to a perpetuation of their ill-assorted union, and that she had given her word not to interfere with him: What might be the probable effect on Winifred's consciouco if the tidings ever reached her that her husband was on the point of making a new alliance was a thought altogether remote from his mind. He would not have comprehended it even if it had forced itself on his attention. He meant to keep his own secret, and, he did not doubt that Winifred would keep hers, and in this faith he laid siege to the heart of the woman whom his sister had chosen for his wife. . There was something in the American debutante that alternately repelled and attracted Sir Reginald Denison. The source of the attraction he could scarcely define. It was not her beauty; for strictly speaking Theresa Coffin was not beautiful. Her mouth and nose, though indicating character, were too large to satisfy such a connoissour of female beauty as Sic Reginald claimed to be. But she had a sweet oyal face, with a broad clear brow, large penetrating trembling nor overwhelmed with confusion, as Ladies', 2s. 114d.; Gent's, 4s. 11d. per dos.
